

Chamber's Bradley Joins Bloomberg Radio's "Balance of Power"

Businesses need more support from Congress, and lawmakers should take a thoughtful approach to devising this new wave of aid. Chamber Executive Vice President and Chief Policy Officer Neil Bradley discussed policies that should be enacted on Bloomberg Radio's Balance of Power today.

"In this moment we can take a pause, and we can assess exactly what's needed, which will allow us to have a much more targeted approach to helping the economy recover more quickly," Bradley said.

Bradley said the business community needs policies that promote a feeling of certainty to help businesses safely reopen, including a liability safe harbor provision for businesses that are following public health guidelines. He also pushed for continued financial support for businesses that won't be returning to business until later in the reopening process.

He also addressed the Chamber's national initiative to address inequality of opportunity. More than 400 business associations have partnered with the Chamber's efforts, which focus on education, employment, entrepreneurship, and criminal justice reform.

"This isn't just about a national solution, it's about implementing change at the state and the local level, in these communities," Bradley said. "We're committed to taking concrete steps to help expand education, employment, for African Americans who want to start their own business. There's a lot to be done here."
